In the past, we have relied heavily on the limited functionality of the web to increase the ease of our students' access to data, and to improve their learning experience. However, the web is limited in that it only allows you to experience information and data that has been collected, edited, classified, and arranged for you in a certain way. This is a very primitive process, and the results are not always reliable. When you use a mobile device, you are in full control of what you can see, where you go, and what you can do. You can view, search, search, upload, add, edit, delete, and navigate through information as you wish. The mobile web allows you to experience data, information, and data wherever you go, anytime, and on any device. You have complete freedom, and the real potential to change the way we learn, and the way we live. This is the 21st century, and we are evolving as an industry. Our current form of pedagogy is no longer efficient, and it will become obsolete if we do not develop a stronger, more advanced web-based platform for all our students. Caveira, P. S., & Góes, C. L.
